Compassionate	Self-Doubt
Responsible	Pressure from Expectations

1. Which of your strengths are you most proud of? Why?

One of my biggest strengths is being a good leader. Throughout my college life, I have developed my ability to lead my group toward success. I know how to listen to and observe my groupmates, which helps me understand their strengths and weaknesses. When assigning tasks, I make sure to give responsibilities that match their skills so everyone can contribute effectively.

I also make it a priority to listen to my groupmates whenever they have concerns or problems. I believe that being a good leader is not only about being responsible and achieving goals, but also about having compassion and understanding for the people you lead. I am proud that I have learned how to balance compassion with responsibility, allowing me to support my group while still keeping everyone focused on our goals.

2. Which weakness do you want to improve the most? Why?

One of the weaknesses I want to improve the most is my fear of uncertainty. I am the kind of person who likes to plan ahead and have an idea of what will happen next. Because of this, I sometimes feel anxious when my plans do not go as expected or when an unexpected challenge suddenly comes my way.

I want to improve this because I understand that life is full of uncertainty, and we cannot always predict or plan everything. Instead of being afraid of unexpected situations, I want to learn how to face them with confidence and adapt to whatever challenges come my way. I believe that embracing uncertainty can also help me discover new opportunities, learn from unexpected experiences, and gain things that I would not have experienced if I always stayed within my plans.

3. How can you use your strengths to overcome your weaknesses?

I can use my strengths as a leader to overcome my weaknesses. My strengths in calmness, analysis and problem solving help me face uncertainty of worrying about what could go wrong. My strengths in observation allow me to manage overthinking. By letting thoughts spiral I use my observant strengths to gather facts, make a decision and move forward without dwelling. The same observant strengths help me notice what changes and what stays the same when sudden shifts occur making adaptation easier of feeling overwhelmed.

My strengths in listening help me understand others and I can apply this listening strength to myself listening to my doubts with patience instead of harsh judgment. Compassion is another strength that works in the way I extend the understanding I give to people to myself when I make mistakes or miss my own expectations. Because I am responsible my sense of responsibility is a strength that lets me carry expectations and follow through. I use that strength to set realistic goals for myself so pressure from others does not weigh me down.

4. What is one specific thing you can do to become a better version of yourself?

One specific thing I can do to become a better version of myself is to explore things that I am not comfortable with. I can't improve myself if I stay in my comfort zone, because staying there means I never have to test my abilities or grow beyond what I already know. Real growth comes from facing new challenges, even when they feel uncertain or intimidating.

Facing uncertainty pushes me to think of new, creative solutions instead of relying only on what is familiar. That process of stepping outside my comfort zone is what actually helps me build and improve my skills, because I am forced to adapt, problem-solve, and learn things I wouldn't have discovered otherwise.
